
ERIC GRAVELY

COACH. DEVELOP. TRANSFORM.

YOUR PERSONAL SALES AVATAR

The Dominant

Direct. Decisive. Allergic to wasted time.

WHAT THIS MEANS

You take control of situations because waiting on other people physically hurts. You measure life in wins, speak in bottom lines, and would rather ask forgiveness than permission. People experience you as intense, confident, and occasionally blunt — and you're mostly fine with that. Conflict doesn't scare you; stagnation does.

HOW THIS SHOWS UP WHEN YOU SELL

You're a natural closer. Your instinct is to control the process, create urgency, and ask directly for the business — which makes you lethal late in deals where someone has to push. You thrive in competitive, fast-cycle selling and exec conversations where decisiveness is respected. What works for you: options-based closes (“A or B by Friday?”), owning the next step in every interaction, and deals where speed is a feature, not a threat.

Your blind spot: Your pace runs people over. You steamroll slower buyers, skip discovery when you smell a close, and read hesitation as weakness when it's often just a different decision style. The deals you lose, you lose early — before you realized the buyer needed safety or evidence, not speed.

HOW TO SELL TO EVERY TYPE — AS THE DOMINANT

This is where deals are won or lost: selling to people who aren't wired like you.

Selling to the dominant buyers (your mirror)

- Match their pace and be blunt — they respect directness, not deference.
- Give them control through options: “A or B by Friday?” never open-ended.
- Don't fight for the wheel. Make THEM the winner of the deal.

Selling to the ego buyers

- Your directness can bruise their image. Never win an argument at their expense — you'll win the point and lose the deal.
- Sell how this elevates THEM: the win they present to their board, the credit they take.
- Make them the hero of every recap. Their name on the victory, your name on the invoice.

Selling to the caring buyers

- Your intensity reads as pressure. Slow the close down on purpose.
- Sell safety: references, a pilot, a rollback plan. Build a path of small yeses.
- Never force a fast decision — you'll get a polite yes and a silent ghost.

Selling to the analytical buyers

- Your confidence is not evidence. Bring data and send materials before the call.
- Be ready for “how do you know that?” on every claim you make.
- Never wing a number. One wrong stat and your credibility is gone for good.